

Editor's note

By Linda L. Randell

Many years ago, there was a television show called "You Are There." The premise was that the show would take the viewer back to watch historic events unfolding on a real-time basis. The article in this issue on the break-up of AT&T by Gerry Connell, the chief government prosecutor (who is now the chair-elect of this Section), presents a "You Are There" view.

Gerry's article provides the exclamation point ending to a hundred years of the monopoly philosophy and contribution to developing technology chronicled in the second installment of Judge Cudahy's two-part look at AT&T's glorious past, also in this issue of Infrastructure.

We provided an overview of wind generation in the Winter '05 issue. The final article in Spring '05 picks up from that overview and addresses the tax credits that can be a key element in promoting the use of renewable resources to generate electricity. Thanks to Newsletter Committee member David Hardy for suggesting this practical discussion.

We are always looking for suggestions on subjects to cover in future issues. If there are areas that you would like Infrastructure to cover or if you have comments on what we've published recently, please e-mail me at lrاندell@wiggin.com.
